Background

Victoria Police Values
Victoria Police provides policing services to the Victoria community 24 hours a day, 7 days a week working to keep Victorians safe. We are committed to ensuring that all our people follow our core values:

› Integrity
› Leadership
› Flexibility
› Respect
› Support
› Professionalism

Eligibility
TO BECOME A VICTORIA POLICE MEMBER YOU MUST:

› Be 18 years old or over.
› Be an Australian citizen or have permanent residency.
› If you are under 21, you must have passed the Victorian Certificate of Education (VCE) or equivalent. The Senior Level Victorian Certificate of Applied Learning (VCAL) is also accepted.
› Meet eligibility requirements regarding criminal and traffic convictions.
› Meet medical standards.
› Be fit and ready to work in a demanding and physically challenging role.
› In addition to the above eligibility requirements, police members must also hold a current Victorian drivers licence.
About the role

The people of Victoria rely on police to protect life and property, detect and apprehend offenders, and help those in need of assistance. Therefore, a police officer performs duties that are diverse, stimulating and challenging. First you must complete a 33 week training phase, then you will be deployed as a general duties police officer to a police station somewhere in Victoria.

General duty police officers are the foundation of Victoria Police and are essential to ensure that the Victorian community functions safely. General duty officers are always the first on the scene at any reportable crime or public need and provide their service to the community 24 hours a day, 7 days a week.

The majority of Victoria Police members work as general duties police officers but there are also many specialist roles that require further training and usually at least 4 years general duties operational experience as a pre-requisite.
What does a General Duties Police Officer do?

Duties are varied and you will come into contact with people from all walks of life. Some of the people you deal with will display values and behaviours that contradict your own. However, as a police officer you are required to remain impartial. Below is a list of some of the situations that you may have to manage as a general duties police officer:

› prevent anti-social behaviour
› deal with community safety concerns
› resolve disputes
› attend at accidents
› investigate crime
› enforce traffic law
› deal with drug and alcohol affected people
› attend critical incidents and emergencies

You are required to submit paperwork on most situations you attend including keeping a running sheet which is an ongoing diary of the duties you perform during each shift. You will also be required to prepare paperwork for court and subsequently attend hearings and give evidence.

While the role of a police officer is challenging, it is also rewarding; as a police officer you will make a difference to the Victorian community every day.

Below are some general tips to improve your literacy skills. They have been broken up into the areas of reading, writing and oral communication.

Reading

1. Read something different than what you normally read and read more! E.g. read the newspaper from front to back each day.
2. Read each article all the way through, then re-read them and identify the main points.
3. Scan before you read the article in full as this will give you an understanding of what it’s about before you read the details.

Preparation Strategies

Tests are run on a monthly basis, check the website http://vpol.acer.edu.au for the most up-to-date information on test dates.
Writing
1. After reading a newspaper article, write a summary of the main points and key supporting evidence.
2. Watch a piece on television or YouTube then write a description of what you saw and a summary of the footage.
3. Re-read your pieces of writing the next day - be critical about your work and challenge yourself to find areas you can improve.
4. Ask another person to review your writing and provide feedback.

Oral Communication
Oral communication involves listening, including the ability to interpret information, and speaking, including the ability to convey the meaning of your message.
1. Speak as often as possible to as many people as possible - practising will help you improve.
2. Listen to a news bulletin or watch an article on television with another person then explain the details of what you saw to them.
3. Read out loud and listen for your mistakes.
4. Arrange social events where you can practise your speaking and listening skills with other people.

Computer Skills Assessment
To prepare for the computer skills assessment you need to make sure you are confident and competent at using a computer, keyboard and mouse. You will need to understand and be able to use the features of common software packages to undertake everyday related computer-based tasks and have an understanding about internet searches. One important aspect of this assessment is that it requires information to be entered accurately and exactly as it is written. Accuracy in typing, and paying attention to capitalisation, full stops, spaces, returns etc. is considered important and should be practised. If the information entered is not accurate and correct then it is deemed an incorrect answer.

You can practise these skills by using a computer in the following ways.
› Using a Word processing package such as MS Word to undertake different tasks relating to:
  • locating and opening files
  • accurately entering information into a document or form
  • formatting text
  • saving files - how and where you save files.
Preparation Strategies

› Using an email software package such as MS Outlook to undertake different tasks relating to:
  • using and constructing the content of emails
  • sending emails.
› Using the internet to undertake different tasks relating to:
  • searching for information
  • identifying relevant information from search results.

Reasoning Tests – (Verbal, Numerical and Abstract)

The Verbal and Numerical reasoning tests are designed to measure these abilities as demonstrated by the capacity to see relationships and solve problems. The tests are primarily intended as a measure of general ability for selection into occupations that involve a moderate to high level of demand on reasoning ability, and for other purposes where the ability to think clearly with words and numbers is involved. While the questions require the use of words and numbers, the level of knowledge required is within that of most people who have completed Year 10. The Abstract reasoning test is included in order to give a balanced measure of general cognitive ability.

The reasoning tests are multiple choice format for the Verbal and Abstract reasoning. The Numerical reasoning involves entering numbers as answers to the questions.

It is recommended that you work steadily through the test. It is not advisable to spend too much time on any one question. Try each question as you come to it. Answer the questions you find easiest first. If you find a question is too difficult, leave it and come back to it later if you have time.

For the Verbal and Abstract reasoning read through all the alternative answers to a question, even if you think the first one is correct, before marking your chosen response. If you think you know the answer to a question, mark it, even if you are not certain. Go on to the next question and come back later if you have time.

For the Numerical reasoning read through the question carefully and write down any notes on the working paper to help you make calculations before entering your answer. If you think you know the answer to a question, enter it, even if you are not certain – you can always change it later. If you find a question too difficult, or hard to understand, leave it and go on to the next question and come back later if you have time.

Please note the following:
› All questions have the same value, therefore by attempting as many questions as possible you stand the best chance of maximising your score.
› No marks are deducted for a wrong answer.

VERBAL REASONING

Verbal reasoning is the ability to understand and reason using concepts framed in words. It aims at testing your ability to think logically, understand relationships, solve problems and think critically, rather than simply understanding vocabulary.

NUMERICAL REASONING

Numerical reasoning measures your ability to understand, analyse, interpret and draw logical conclusions based on numerical data and situations presented in words, patterns and tables.

ABSTRACT REASONING

The abstract reasoning assessment is used to measure the ability to think clearly to solve problems and quickly identify patterns and logical rules based on abstract visual patterns rather than numbers and words. It involves recognising the rule or rules that govern the progression of a pattern from one diagram to another in a series, or to identify the part which is missing from a diagram.

Sample questions are provided to help you prepare for the Victoria Police Entrance examination. The sample questions help you to practise your skills for the Literacy Skills, Summary Writing Task, Extended Writing Task and Oral Assessment Task components.

Mandatory ID cards for Australians

The Australian National Identification card was first raised at the National Tax summit in 1985 as a way to amalgamate government identification systems and reduce the ability to avoid tax and commit health and welfare fraud. The Federal government was keen to introduce legislation to streamline identification for Australian citizens. However, the bill was not passed by the parliament.

Ewart Smith, a retired public servant, noticed some flaws in the draft legislation. Certain regulations necessary for the operation of the ID card system could be overturned by the Senate, which, at the time, was hostile to the idea of the card. As a result, the ID card for Australian citizens was dropped.

After the 2005 London terrorist bombings, the Australian Government once again proposed the introduction of the Australian ID card as a way to help the government combat terrorism and address flaws in the immigration system. The Government believed that an ID card would make a person’s ability to enter Australia under a false identity more difficult and this would deter potential terrorists.

In 2005, critics of the Australian ID card both in Parliament and the general community believed the ID card would infringe on the privacy rights of Australian citizens. The card was seen as an unnecessary piece of bureaucracy that the current Australian passport and Tax File Number systems already addressed.

Ultimately, the idea of an Australian National Identification card has been shelved. However, in today’s current climate of international terrorism, it can never be ruled out.

Should we raise the retirement age?

Pro - Carl Lewis

The burden of rising health and aged-care costs in the Australian Federal budget has been identified by the Productivity Commission as a consequence of unforeseen healthcare costs and the impact of Australian’s increasing longevity. The Commission reported recently that these significant costs to our budget had been underestimated and an estimated 21 per cent tax increase is needed to meet the shortfall in health and aged-care costs. The alternative is for the retirement age of our workforce to be raised.

The Productivity Commission Chairman, Peter Harris, stated recently, “We’d like to provide some better incentives for people to think about continuing to work, because an aging population will cost us.” He went on to explain that when the aged-care pension was first introduced around 1900, people typically lived for about 13 years past retirement. By comparison, a person born in 1986 will live for nearly double that time past retirement.

Overall, Australians are prosperous and are living longer. The rising costs of healthcare for an aging population are a significant government expense. In addition, our government provides benefits to support our aging population, including the aged-care pension and healthcare card and subsidise a range of health and community services run by public and private providers and volunteers.

However, as Australians who are living longer, we also need to take some responsibility for the rising costs of our health and aged-care and not expect the government to shoulder the burden. As a community we must address this significant financial problem if we want to continue to live well into our older age and remain financially secure.

Con – Justin Banks

In response to Carl Lewis’ letter I would like to ask, how is making people stay at work longer really going to help address our aging population’s health and aged-care needs? I think the government’s knee-jerk reaction is not substantiated by data showing the cost-benefit of raising the retirement age and does not acknowledge the complex issues that would need to be addressed to implement this change.

Recently the National Seniors Australia Chief Executive Officer, Michael O’Neil, suggested that simply raising the retirement age may not be the solution to this problem. Mr O’Neil stated workplace ageism is a significant problem for those aged in their late 50’s and older and this is a barrier to employment for them. He explained that a person who loses their job at 55 will be out of work on average 72-plus weeks. It appears mandating when people retire is not going to change workplace attitudes towards hiring seniors and until there is a significant shift in this ageism, increasing the retirement age is not the solution.

COTA Australia, representing older people in the workforce, appears to agree there is no one simple answer to this complex issue. COTA Chief Executive, Ian Yates, stated removing age discrimination in the workplace should be a priority. He also offered an alternative to raising the retirement age by suggesting taxpayers, as a whole, could agree to pay significantly higher taxes which would result in a more generous pension as well as free health and aged-care services. Mr Yates also suggested that the alternative to paying more tax would be to implement a ‘user-pays’ system for our health and aged-care services which would place the financial burden on the individual rather than the government.

People who are aged 55 and older experience declining health and the strain of working could exacerbate their health issues and place a larger burden on the healthcare system. It seems that the suggestion of raising the retirement age to keep people working longer to cover rising health and aged-care costs could also create more healthcare problems.

Raising the retirement age is not the simple solution to the issue of rising health and aged-care costs. Extensive research, including a cost-benefit analysis, is required to demonstrate whether there would, in fact, be any financial gains. And we would also need to address the complex issues faced by seniors in the workplace to ensure that employment opportunities exist for seniors.

Sample Response

Note that this sample response is provided as a model only – it is not an exemplar or the only approach that could be used to write a response.

I agree with COTA Australia’s opinion that there is no simple answer to this issue. We have an expectation to continue to live well beyond our working life but the warning from the Productivity Commission of the impact of increased longevity must be acted on.

However, to suggest that this issue has only two solutions – increasing taxes or raising the retirement age - is short-sighted. After reading both sides to this issue, I think a blended solution may be the best approach.

We need to re-assess the aged-care pension eligibility criteria. The current retirement age, and therefore access to the pension, is based on an arrangement established around 1900 and to assume this is still a good fit for today’s society is foolish. As the Productivity Commission Chairman, Peter Harris, states, the post-retirement period has risen to around double what our current aged-care pension system was designed to service.

Michael O’Neil makes a good point that raising the retirement age will not necessarily ensure that seniors can continue working, even if they’re required to. He explains that currently workplace attitudes towards hiring seniors is a barrier and this workplace ageism needs to be addressed before we can assume seniors will have access to employment opportunities.

We could tackle this issue by finding some middle ground. It may be that we require the retirement age to be raised marginally –e.g. not to age 70, but slightly above the current retirement age, perhaps age 67. This could be supported by government incentives for businesses to hire seniors, workplace programs to support seniors with increased leave to manage health-related issues.

The government should provide incentives for self-funded retirees by removing caps on tax-free superannuation contributions so that people can pay more into their superannuation funds while they’re working. Increasing the number of self-funded retirees reduces the cost of the aged-care pension in the government’s budget.

I believe it is through thoughtful, inclusive debate, careful analysis and measured decision-making that we will come to a solution. We must act with a range of sensible measures to ensure we have a solution to meet our economic needs now and for generations to come.
